Dr. Zafar will discuss how many decisions, such as what major to choose or what career to pursue, are made under uncertainty. How well informed are individuals when they make such decisions? Are their beliefs systematically biased? Using data collected from college students in various settings, he shows that students are quite misinformed, and that beliefs systematically differ by gender. He discusses whether information provision can lead to more informed decisions and close gender gaps.